How does the wage commission determine the going rate for six new workers hired by a new employer under its jurisdiction? The wage commission determines the going rate for six new workers hired by a new employer under its jurisdiction by averaging the wage rates of all the existing employers within the jurisdiction. What is the basic result of the wage commission's method?

The result of the wage commission's method is that it lowers the real wage rate for the new workers. For a new employer in the jurisdiction, the wage commission sets a low wage rate for this group of six new workers. Then, it increases this rate by 2% for each new worker hired, giving the new employer a higher wage rate. This process is repeated throughout the jurisdiction, with the result that as more and more employers are newly subject to the wage commission's jurisdiction, the real wage rate for this group of six new workers is lowered. The wage commission thus lowers the real wage rate for the new workers by decreasing it after a certain number of hires, and then increases it again. Its influence spreads like the water in a duck pond, beginning with a few employers and ending with the entire jurisdiction. Define the adjective "ducklike" and explain its relation to the word "duck." The phrase "ducklike" means like a duck, because ducks float or sink very slowly. Describe the process by which the wage commission sets the wage rates of the employees in the jurisdiction. The wage commission sets the wage rate for the six new workers hired by a new employer. It first determines how many existing employers there are and how many of each type of employee is employed in the jurisdiction. The wage commission then assigns wages based on the number of employees in each employer and on the wage rates of each employer. Now, if the employer is new, the wage commission adjusts the wage rate of the six new workers it sets based on the type of employer, so that the wage rate of the new workers is still "competitive" with what the wage commission determines is the going rate for similar workers in other employers within the jurisdiction. Define "competitive." "Competent" means adequate and skillful. "Competitive" means the same as "competitive." The wage commission determines the going rate for six new workers hired by a new employer under its jurisdiction by averaging the wage rates of all the existing employers within the jurisdiction. Explain why the wage commission
